Recipes

I love yelling about food, but I figure those aren't exactly easy-to-follow instructions. Here are the legit recipes for the meal-stime with Maddy earlier in the book.

Gear

- two small saucepans, at least a quart each
- a big pan, at least five quarts
- a baking dish, probably 9"x13"
- a whisk
- a cheese grater
- an oven preheated to 400°F

Ingredients

- 3 cups milk
- $\frac{1}{2}$ cup butter
- $\frac{1}{2}$ cup AP flour
- many cloves of garlic (optional, but if you skip, please consider your life choices)
- cheese cheese: You want about three cups, yeah? Think maybe two and a half of a melty cheese, like sharp cheddar, and a half cup of a sharp cheese like parmesan, pecorino, or romano
- a bit of paprika (optional)
- some panko — enough to cover your dish
- 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. bag large elbow pasta (if you can only find 1lb bags, use only two thirds of your cheesy sauce; the rest will keep well in the fridge)
- extra toppings or fillings, at your discretion. Peas? Caramelized onions? Diced serranos? A can of hatch green chilis? A whole lot of nothing? The sky's the limit, and you're an adult. You choose.

Method

1. Over medium-high heat, scald your milk: heat slowly, stirring frequently, until starts to bubble but not quite boil, then remove from heat.
2. In your other pan, melt your butter over medium-high heat and add your minced garlic.
3. Slowly incorporate the flour into your melted butter, stirring constantly. The mixture will thicken.

4. Keep stirring your butter/flour mixture — a roux — over the heat. It will slowly start to darken in color. Once it reaches a peanut-butter colored brown, remove it from the heat.
5. Start your noodles to boiling.
6. Add your milk, one third at a time, to the roux, stirring constantly. It's gonna suck for a bit: the mixture will get super thick. Use a spoon to start, then switch to a whisk as the mixture gets thinner.
7. Continue stirring your bechamel over medium heat until it gets silky and any graininess has disappeared. It shouldn't be thin; if it is, keep heating. It'll be thick enough when you can dip a spoon in, drag your finger across the back of the spoon, and the sauce won't re-cover the stripe.
8. Mix your cheese into the bechamel, stir until it melts, but no further. Remove from the heat.
9. When your noodles are done, drain and stir in your cheese sauce.
10. Transfer your noodles to your dish — it probably won't all fit, but the rest will keep in the fridge.
11. Top with panko and toss into your oven for ten or fifteen minutes. If you like your topping browned, turn on the broiler for the last two minutes or so, but keep an eye on it so you don't burn it.

Serves idk 5 or 6.
